impressions upon my mind. I assisted my friend in the education of his scholars, and also paid strict attention to study. With him I proceeded in the Latin Classis. I read also Bunbitts Testament, The Lives of Perkins, Wilson and Bull, and part of their other writings, also Doddridges Rise and Progress and various other books upon religious subjects. I also purchased a little farm consisting of a House and fifteen acres of Land upon which I studied and practiced agriculture for about two years, and I should undoubtedly have continued in this way of life, but Providence interposed, and on a sudden I was requested to take the care and education of the children of three Gentlemen at some distance and I gave up the delights of plowing and sowing, and reaping. Should I be called upon to resume this employment, I should find my little stock of knowledge in Agriculture exceedingly useful to me. In this last ^(e) situation I first became acquainted with the affectionate and willing partner of my enterprises.
