even in the cannons mouth, if they had any cannon to fight with. But I trust, this fire is quenched in a great degree, in one of them at least, by the Grace of God: and that henceforward, the weapons of his warfare will not be carnal, but mighty thro' God to the pulling down strong holds. As when the sun shines in at the Window, and puts out the fire, so may the Sun of Righteousness shine in at the windows of ^{both} their souls, and burn out every flame for war except it be to fight the good fight of faith, under the banner of the Cross, as good Soldiers of Jesus Christ. It appears that they are trained to war from their very childhood by a skilful person appointed for that purpose. — Tosi represents himself to have been very daring and mischievous in his early years, and on one occasion he so offended his father, on being concerned with some other boys in robbing the Kings garden, that he was banished for three years, into the interior of the country under severe restrictions, and not suffered to see his parents all that time.

I have never seen Tosi and Tetterree really angry with each other but once: they were very violent, and at one time I thought they would have come to blows.
This was occasioned by Tetterree accusing Tosi of doing something of which he was perfectly innocent. As the storm rose higher and higher one of the maid servants came in and told Tetterree that the needle he positively declared he saw Tosi take from off the kitchen table, was laying on the floor (I fancy he had swept it off with his coat as he passed) Tetterrees confusion on having falsely accused his friend, ^{without knowing it} was manifest in his countenance. but before he had time to express his sorrow
