

who had been a good deal at sea, and were thereupon a valuable acquisition to the Master: and, on his promising to be kind to them, I agreed that he should take them on his own terms. -

They all left Port Jackson, in the Fredrick, in November, with the gratifying hope, of soon seeing their Country and friends. -

When the ship reached the north cape of Newzealand, Duaterra went on shore, for two days, to procure supplies of Pork and Potatoes as he was well known, in that place, and had many friends among the natives. -

As soon as the ship had procured her necessary supplies, she proceeded on her cruise, and, in little more than six months time, procured a Cargo, and was ready to depart from the Coast. - Duaterra, finding that the Master intended to sail for England, naturally requested that he and his companions might be put on shore, on the specific terms of their engagement with the Master, made by me, on their behalf. -

The ship lay (at the time) in the mouth of the Bay of Islands, where the residences of all their relatives then stood, and Duaterra had got every thing ready, to put into the boat - expecting they would be immediately put on shore. - The Master, however, on his being urged to land them, said he would do so by and by, when they had caught another whale, and the vessel then bore away from the Harbour. Duaterra felt great distress on this occasion, as he had
