

79

deck with some of the Muskets, and was trying one of the flints, in a musket lock, whether it would strike fire, when a spark from it, caught the powder and the explosion killed all within its reach. — He pressed me much to go into their harbour:— I told him I probably might do so before I left Nezeval, provided the wind would permit; but I could not then go, on account of the stock and number of people, I had on board the Active. — I then addressed him on the subject of peace, pointed out to him, how much more it would be, for their interest and happiness, to turn their attention to agriculture, and the improvement of their country, than continue to fight and murder one another, and particularly now as the Europeans were about to settle amongst them, through whom they would obtain wheat to sow their land and tools to cultivate it, I assured them, that every assistance would be given by the Europeans to promote the improvement of their present situation; and that, if they would only attend to the cultivation of their land, and