on shore to open a communication with the natives. Shortly after the boat had reached the Beach, we heard a great noise; Quaterro was uneasy because the boat did not return so soon as was expected; - he was afraid that some quarrel had taken place, between the inhabitants and the people in the boat; and observed - "if they had injured any of his men, he would immediately declare war against them with all the force he could command -"

In about an hour after dark, the boat returned safe and they informed us, that they had been very kindly received, and that the noise we had heard was only their rejoicings. - They told us there were plenty of fine hogs and potatoes on shore, both of which we much wanted, the Brig being full of people. - This information determined me to visit the village in the morning. - However on the following day a Chief named Pithi (nephew to Kaupa) came after the Active. - He was a very stout handsome man and in the prime of life, with mild manners, and a countenance both pleasing and interesting. - I invited him on board; - The Chief Jimmoranghee was well known to Pithi. after
