

dedicate his own and his tribes rights.

He stated, that he was a friend to both parties; and, as one had been wounded on both sides, he recommended that the difference should be settled as amicably as would be consistent with their rights.

After this Chief had ended his address, another principal man, belonging to the Village, started up; and, taking a long spear in his hand, began to state all the particulars of the present difference. He spoke with great feeling, stamped with his foot at every turn, and brandished his spear, while warlike indignation fired his countenance.