

Enakhee - The scenes of slaughter and cannibalism at, and after the battle in which Enakhee was killed were so horrid and offensive to him that he could not eat any thing for four days - He spoke with the greatest abhorrence of the Cannibalism of his Countrymen and said he would never go to War again - That Chungee had solicited him to accompany him in his last expedition against Rutoroa, but he had refused to go - He observed, that he would never be quiet from War, that he could not live in the Country, and asked me if I would afford him any protection if he and his family came to Port Jackson - I promised him I would - He said he had seen Chungee since his return, who informed him, that it was his intention to form another expedition against Tera-Rakha as soon as he left New Zealand, but he would not do it until I was gone - He asked me if I had seen Chungee, and whether he was friendly or not, I told him I had, and that we were very friendly - He thought our difference at Port Jackson might have interrupted our friendship, and expressed his satisfaction that we were reconciled by what he observed, that there was no force in New Zealand that could resist the people at the Bay of Islands, they were so powerful from the abundance of Arms and Ammunition which they possess, and lamented that they had such means for continual War, which occasioned such great public calamities Famine and distress every where -
